BUT GOODREADS DIDINT HAVE IT I enjoyed how this book showed how different the south was from the north during the black right movement It shows two young african american girls from the north visiting their grandma who lives in the south, and how discremination against african americans was the social norm down there The grandmas tries to shelter her grand daughters by walking to places and making up excuses for them to not use the fountain as a way of holding on to her pride the following year after african americans were given equal rights the girls return to see how everything has changed and blacks and whites are migrated into all the same facilities equally
